Customer Reviews

Alyce Faye Bragg’s first collection of stories has already been reprinted and at least part of the credit goes to her love affair with the hills. These are the hills of West Virginia and from the small, very small town of Ovapa in sparsely populated Clay County. In her new book, Alyce Faye will tell you about drinking clear Appalachian mountain spring water, an addictive experience. If you have ever been exposed to farm living, you will be reached by her writing of the old vacant farm, “a sad sight.” Alyce Faye says we can all go `back home` since she had already done this. She also recalls early holiday memories and her mother’s Christian examples. Alyce Faye takes you there; her descriptions are powerful and enjoyable. But there are many things about rural life you may not already know: a shucking peg, about duck sitting, a pennyroyal, leather britches (not clothing), the horse that should have gone to jail and all about green apples and yellow jackets (ouch!). She writes about the real Mountaineer and a real Mountain woman. It may be humorous or sometimes sad, but it is never dull. A gracious real mountain woman herself, Alyce Faye Bragg brings real insight to her stories about country life.

A wonderful collection of nostalgic essays on the joys and sorrows of life in the hills. Based in a love for life and a deep faith, this second collection of Ms. Bragg's heartwarming writings will delight any reader seeking a reason to be thankful and hopeful.

I grew up just a few miles from Ovapa, maybe even more back in the mountains. All her books take me home again and I read them over and over. I only wish all children had the opportunity to grow up like we did and be able to enjoy the outdoors and family. Seems like picnic lunches by the creek are a thing of the past, along with apple butter, stringing beans on the front porch (this was our entertainment!) and Sunday Dinner at Granny’s with all the cousins to play with. Really miss those “good old days”
